Commercial.

MONDAY EVENING, May 9th 1879.

General business in this market continues quite fair for the season, and we note a continued good demand for flour, wheat, corn, and oats.

The order trade keeps up unusually well this spring, and indications are that that branch of business will be much more active during the coming summer than in past seasons.

The convenience and easy access of Cairo as a market are each year becoming more widely known and appreciated, and whenever given a fair trial, have invariably given satisfaction to both shippers and purchasers of the leading agricultural staples.

Though in her mercantile career, Cairo may yet be said to be in her infancy, and though the amount of business now transacted here will seem quite insignificant in future years when its commercial importance shall be everywhere recognized, now is the time to lay the foundation of her future greatness, to which end each and every one of our merchants should use his utmost energies to attract all the business he can attend to himself, and encourage other men with capital to come and do likewise.

We have abundant evidence that there is room for double the number of men and amount of capital now engaged in the produce business here, and with that addition, the increased amount of business offering would speedily necessitate the coming of many more. In this way our commercial growth will be much more rapid, and the chances of individual success will be greatly increased. What they attempt to do, our merchants should do as a class do well. What they should do is to attempt more, and increase their facilities for doing a larger business equally as well.
